

Three things to consider when buying a second home

The demand for second homes is on the rise. As a buyer, here is what you should consider before making a purchase.

Sponsored By RBC Wealth Management

CULTURE DESK

NATHANIEL MARY QUINN'S CUBIST PORTRAITS ADDRESS THE PSYCHIC RUPTURES OF GENTRIFICATION IN BROOKLYN

By Andrea K. Scott
September 15, 2018

"Paint forms as I think them, not as I see them," Picasso said. Nathaniel Mary Quinn, the forty-one-year-old New York artist, paints people as he feels them, not as they look. His fragmented approach to the human figure is a realist riff on synthetic Cubism. His composite portraits (at Salon 94, through October 27th) may look like collages—a hallmark of Cubism—but they aren't. Instead, he meticulously renders each piece of his pictorial puzzles in oil, paint stick, pastel, charcoal, gouache, and gold leaf, based on shards of images he finds online, in fashion magazines, and even in his own photo albums.

Quinn's path to painting is as striking as his art work. (The best account of it is the artist's own, published in the August issue of British Vogue.) Growing up in Chicago, in the Robert Taylor Homes, a housing project known as the Hole, he was such a gifted draftsman that gangs offered him protection on the condition that he draw them into a comic strip. At the age of fifteen, he earned a scholarship to the Culver Academies boarding school, in Indiana. (The school's Web site lists notable alumni, including George Steinbrenner and Gene Siskel. Note to Culver: add Quinn to the list.) During his first month at school, his mother, Mary, died—it was then that he folded her name into his own. When Quinn returned home to Chicago for Thanksgiving, he discovered that his father and four brothers had moved away, abandoning him without notice. He has not seen them since.

"The Borrower," 2018. Artwork by Nathaniel Mary Quinn / Salon 94

VIDEO FROM THE NEW YORKER

Fighting COVID-19 with Ancestral Wisdom in the Amazon

After receiving an M.F.A., in painting, at N.Y.U., Quinn supported himself by teaching at-risk youth in New York through the Center for Alternative Sentencing and Employment Services (CASES). He painted at night, using the second bedroom in the apartment he shared with his wife as a studio. He exhibited steadily for a decade, mostly in New York, with one-person shows at the Five Myles gallery and Rush Arts, among other spaces. But the media loves an overnight sensation and, in 2014, when the global powerhouse Pace offered Quinn a show at their London gallery, the headline in one local newspaper read, "Artist who grew up in poverty in Chicago chooses London for first show." Shows in Chicago, L.A., and Turin, Italy, followed, as did sales to celebrities (Elton John, Anderson Cooper, Carmelo Anthony), and, most important, acquisitions by the Whitney and the Art Institute of Chicago.

"Homeboy Down the Block," 2018. Artwork by Nathaniel Mary Quinn / Salon 94

The portraits in Quinn's new show are based on his neighbors in Crown Heights, where he and his wife recently bought a house. He recognizes an old Brooklyn vanishing, and his portraits convey the psychic ruptures of gentrification but also what he described to me recently as "the complexities of the human essence." "We are a cacophony of experience," he said. "Not just a seamless self." Of course, art that aims to reach beyond the visible world to express sensation is as old as Impressionism, and Quinn is clearly steeped in art history. There's no denying his debt to Francis Bacon (although he replaces the British artist's existentialism with empathy), and, just as Bacon looked back to Velázquez, one can see Quinn rifling through the canon. Take, for instance, in "Homeboy Down the Block," the extravagant hat that tops the tumbled features—eyes at once too low and too high above a cinematically black-and-white mouth—which might have been filched from the head of a Dutchman in a portrait by Frans Hals.

Andrea K. Scott is the art editor of Goings On About Town and has profiled the artists Cory Arcangel and Sarah Sze for the magazine.

More: Art Portraits Brooklyn New York City

THE NEW YORKER RECOMMENDS

What our staff is reading, watching, and listening to each week.

Enter your e-mail address

Your e-mail address Sign up

Will be used in accordance with our Privacy Policy.

Read More

FIVE FEMALE PAINTERS TO SEE IN NEW YORK ART GALLERIES

Women including Judith Eislser, Joan Mitchell, and Charline von Heyl are out in full force this week.

By Andrea K. Scott

RICHANDA RHODEN, A FASCINATING PAINTER WHOSE WORK WAS RARELY SHOWN IN HER LIFETIME

By Andrea K. Scott

VIDEO
REWRITING RACIST HEADLINES

The artist and media critic Alexandra Bell revises biased news coverage.

ANNALS OF ARCHITECTURE
HAS THE PANDEMIC TRANSFORMED THE OFFICE FOREVER?

The post-pandemic future of open-plan work.

By John Seabrook

DR. MARTY®

How Dogs Cry For Help: 3 Warning Signs Your Dogs Is Crying For Help

➔

THE NEW YORKER

Presidents' Day Sale

12 weeks for $12 $6, plus get a free tote. Cancel anytime.

SUBSCRIBE

SECTIONS

News
Books & Culture
Fiction & Poetry
Humor & Cartoons
Magazine

Crossword
Video
Podcasts
Archive
Goings On

MORE

Customer Care
Shop The New Yorker
Buy Covers and Cartoons
Condé Nast Store
Digital Access

Newsletters
Jigsaw Puzzle
RSS
Site Map

About Careers
Contact

F.A.Q.
Media Kit
Press